

PHOTOS BY DANIELLE FROST/POST-RECORD

Bulldozers are busy moving dirt at the Hayes Freedom site. The new, 20,000 square foot school is expected to be complete by summer. It will be its third and final location since 2007. The school provides an alternative education program for approximately 158 students in the Camas School District.

Building HAYES FREEDOM HIGH SCHOOL from the ground up

❑ Structure is approximately 30 percent finished and should be complete in June

By Danielle Frost
Post-Record staff

Construction is moving forward at the new Hayes Freedom High School in Camas.

Last week, the sounds of drilling, sawing and hammering could be heard, despite severe winds, which made working on the roof a challenge.

"It's been going very well," said Heidi Rosenberg, director of capital programs for the Camas School District. "We're about 30 percent complete now. We have quite a few Hayes students and teachers who have come over to check it out. When they see the reality of the design, they get very excited."

Construction on the new school is expected to cost approximately $3.9 million, which is paid for out of the 2007 bond and matching funds from the state of Washington.

Hayes Freedom will be home to approximately 150

Heidi Rosenberg, director of capital programs for the Camas School District, points out some of the classroom features at Hayes Freedom.

See School, page A3